‘There was a man walking in a field, when he heard the sound of thunder in some clouds, and he heard some speech in the clouds: ‘Irrigate so and so’s – mentioned by name – garden.’ The cloud then came to that area which was of volcanic remains of lava and it let out the rain it contained, then it came to trails of water until it stopped at a riverbed and the cloud took up some water. The man followed the cloud until it reached another person who was standing in his own garden and irrigating it. So the first man said: ‘O slave of Allaah what is your name?’

He said: 'Why do you ask?'

The man replied: 'Indeed I heard in this cloud from which is this rain; 'water so and so's garden' with your name, so what is it that you do with it once you have cultivated the land?'

He said: 'If you say that is the case, then indeed what I do is divide it into three parts; I make one third for me and my family, a third I return back into the garden and a third I place for the impoverished, the needy and the wayfarer.'
